Satan "is nonexistent as an individual self"; rather, he is the violence that breaks out from mimetic desire. To refrain from improper mimetic desire is to make Satan "fall like lightning" from the sky (alluding to Luke 10:18). Second, Girard indirectly addresses the charge of anti-Semitism that has often come his way.

See Satan Fall Like Lightning is a small price to pay to keep the victim cycle at bay. I think Girard is a genius, and though his take is anthropological, it need not be used to reduce religion to that all the time. This option I See Satan Fall Like Lightning little sense in context. Thus, "Satan expelled Satan."
