Reflections on Teaching: From Surviving to Thriving November 8, 2018 Chris Palmer I had known it all along at some level, but now it suddenly became glaringly obvious to me. Deep down, sometimes out of conscious reach, students want to be transformed and their lives made more useful, productive, and powerful.

Reflections on Teaching: From Surviving to Thriving

A reflective teacher is an effective teacher. And educators do tend to reflect on their teaching methods. In an article titled "Teacher Reflection In a Hall of Mirrors: Historical Influences and Political Reverberations," researcher Lynn Fendler states that teachers are reflective by nature as they continuously make adjustments in instruction.

End of Year Reflection for Teachers. One of the best parts about teaching is that each year you start over with a new group of students, new challenges, and new opportunities to make a difference. Each year, you have the chance to grow and perfect your craft as a teacher. Each year when state testing is over, benchmarks are complete, permanent records are filed away, and the sun is shining, I start reflecting on the year and contemplating the changes I want to make for the next year.

Reflecting on your teaching is a way to make you aware of how you teach. It is a method for self-assessment. If we don't reflect, then we are teaching "in the dark" without knowing if we are effective and if we should modify our teaching. Reflecting requires us to answer a number of questions, including the following:

Teacher reflection can be thought of as taking necessary steps to analyse and articulate problems before taking action. This allows for more constructive action to be taken rather than implementing a quick fix (Boody, 2008). The challenge is to be able to demonstrate in action what is taught in the classroom.
